Every technique and action is simulated in-game using the new technology, meaning players are presented with a new “look” on the pitch. With the use of new animation data gathered from real players using the technology, players can visibly execute the ball-technique and maintain an authentic feel to the sport. The technology also offers the capability to make the game playable in the dark by using camera tracking data from the player. Real players use a range of tactics and techniques on the pitch, and the level of data captured from the match is used to simulate many of the actions in the game - such as crosses, passes and dribbling - in line with the movements of a real-life player. The developers of FIFA have used the data collected from real players to create an authentic experience with game-play that closely replicates the physicality of playing a game of football. “The players are the stars of our sport - it is their intensity that fuels our passion, so the technical feedback we capture from the players means we can truly simulate what it's like to play,” said David Rutter, FIFA's technical director. “With only a little more work, we can now put players on the pitch and make them appear as if they're really there.” FIFA 22 is the first EA SPORTS FIFA title to feature the new HyperMotion Technology. Additional feature upgrades include Enhanced AI through a new artificial intelligence system, the introduction of a new Engine that is up to 60 times faster than its predecessor, a completely redesigned match engine, and many more new features. For the first time, FIFA will include the full depth of official leagues, teams and players from around the world. Finally, a new goal-line technology has been added to accurately track shots taken and saves by goalkeepers. Take a quick look at the new HyperMotion Technology in action below:
