Ten years ago, a young man named Vincent van Gogh cut his hand off after becoming obsessed with the idea of the act of suicide itself. The aneurysm in Vincent's mind grew larger and larger until one day he could no longer fight the urge any longer. When he finally succumbed to the pain and exsanguination brought on by the aneurysm, Vincent wrote a letter to his brother shortly before succumbing. This letter is written to raise questions for those involved in the medical field about how medical professionals should engage with the mentally ill. This film tells the story of Vincent van Gogh and his brother Theo who was forced to deal with the aftermath of their failing relationship, which is most apparent in the last two years of Vincent's life. In the months leading up to his death, Vincent's seizures became increasingly frequent and more severe. His relationship with Paul Gauguin, a fellow student and artist, also deteriorated, although the two remained friends. Vincent recorded an unusual number of hours of his life and sound effects on shellac and magneto-optical disc. As an aspiring artist, he made notes about his progress and a number of studies in which he was struggling to understand the movements of light, color and shape. His final suicide is something that people have been aware of for many decades, but what they do not realize is that before he put the turpentine in his right arm, he taped up his left. He wrote his suicide note with his left hand, an important source of controversy in the study of his art. Vincent also wrote a letter to Theo describing the argument that would occur when he hanged himself from the gaspipe. In this letter he explains that he was unable to drive his aneurysm further, and that he feels his life has no meaning. The final product of this film is a short film of Vincent's short story 'The Bedroom' (written and directed by Paul Gauguin). Other short stories and dreams written by Vincent about his self-destruction are also included in this presentation. The short film was donated to the Rhode Island School of Design Museum and is available to view as part of the Van Gogh Collection, and is also available to view online at R.I.S.D. since August 7, 2003.
