The Complete Book on AngularJS.Q: Can you accept an SPF record for an entire domain, or just for one subdomain? Can you accept an SPF record for an entire domain, or just for one subdomain?

example.com?subdomain.example.com A: SPF records are attached to an email address and are only valid for the domain(s) associated with the email address. "managing your own mail server" is usually done on a "subdomain-by-subdomain" basis (ex. www.example.com), meaning that the domains by themselves do not have an SPF record. If you have multiple domains associated with an email address, you should set up SPF records for each of the domains associated with the email address. If you have multiple domains associated with an email address, and you're the one publishing the email address you wish to control, you can set up an SPF record to cover all of the domains that you publish to. If this is the case, then you wouldn't use the example.com?subdomain.example.com syntax. If you are only publishing your c6a93da74d
