Baseline predictors of treatment for an anxiety disorder. Prior research on predictors of treatment initiation for anxiety disorders has been limited. The objective of this study was to assess baseline predictors of medication initiation for anxiety disorders. In this prospective cohort study, the treatment histories of 2366 adults who received primary care at the Veterans Affairs

Puget Sound Health Care System were ascertained via a chart review. Bivariate analyses and multivariate logistic regression were used to examine the relationship between baseline patient characteristics and treatment. Bivariate analyses showed that low baseline satisfaction, high baseline anxiety and substance use, and higher symptom severity were predictive of starting medication. Regression modeling results showed that after adjusting for many possible confounders, patients with anxiety disorders without substance use who reported low satisfaction with their overall health were significantly more likely to have been started on pharmacotherapy than their more satisfied peers (odds ratio [OR]=1.62, 95% confidence interval [CI]=1.26-2.11). Patients with an anxiety disorder who scored in the top quartile of anxiety severity were significantly more likely to be started on medication than those with a low anxiety severity score (OR=1.46, 95% CI=1.19-1.81).
