There are three major components to Lightroom; Library, Develop and Finish. With version 5, Adobe has taken a step forward in helping photographers organize their images. A goal of the application is to reduce the amount of time spent in organizing your images. Adobe has made it easier for novice users and professionals to create a smart Project. The smart project features a palette that shows you unneeded frames so you can focus on what you want. With this new feature you can narrow down the filters, adjustments and other tools that best suit your image. It not only saves you time by narrowing down your options, but it provides you with convenience for the first time you use the smart project in that it guides you on which tools you want to use as you proceed. One of my favorite features about the new update is the ability to view the image in a 100% view crop. It's slow to open and maybe a little bit of a novelty, but it is a great way to learn how your final crop will look. You can also adjust the amount of crop that you see. You can even control the amount of grey scale to see what extreme a crop will look like. Scanning pictures for sharpness and the amount of sharpness affected by the file format is a new feature. It takes a little work to set up, but will cut down on image processing time and it's very helpful for those who have a digital camera with a viewfinder. To get the most out of Lightroom, you really need to learn how to use the 'keyboard shortcuts' View menu. The first thing that I do is click on the 'Camera RAW' tab and make sure Compose Tool is checked. That means that I can only crop by composition. The next thing I do is go to the 'Preferences' tab and turn on the 'Lighttable.' Now I have a 'live view' of the image in my image window.
