A couple of weeks ago I posted a link to a post about geometry-of-faith questions. The blog's author reflected on the intersection of his Catholic faith and his education in mathematics. For many, that is an entirely false dilemma: most Catholics don't have strong mathematical training and quite a few of them struggle to understand the mathematical underpinnings of their faith. This fact has left me with two large questions in my mind: Is a strong mathematical understanding (or at least comfort with some of the basic concepts) of the world a component of belief? Given that comfort with the world and the worldliness of the Church is one of the most difficult things for so many Catholics, shouldn't they be concerned that their faith is at odds with their presuppositions and worldview? To that end, I've posed two questions to several orthodox and conservative Catholics (both men and women). One is quite simple: "How can one have a healthy, orthodox faith while remaining wholly in the world?" and "Does Catholicism ever contradict one's worldviews, meaning that their worldviews and their faith are at odds?" I'll be posting responses (all upvotes were used) in a series of blog posts. [
