Neurotrauma, including stroke, has been the leading cause of disability and mortality in the United States. Until recently, there has been no effective treatment for acute neurotrauma. New data from this lab and others suggest that the N-methyl-D-aspartate (NMDA) receptor is a therapeutic target. The NMDA receptor is a key regulator of neuronal cell death and recovery after neurotrauma. Therapeutic administration of the NMDA receptor antagonist, ketamine, was found to be neuroprotective following brain injury in several animal models. However, the neuroprotective mechanism remains elusive. This application is based upon our recent discovery of alterations in the central nervous system (CNS) growth factor, basic fibroblast growth factor (bFGF), after brain injury. Further, we have shown that exogenous bFGF administration is protective after brain injury. Importantly, bFGF receptor expression
